Dear Eve team,

In law, a hallucinated citation isn't a rough draft, it's malpractice. The hard part of legal AI is the part I work on every day: making an agent trustworthy enough to stand on real stakes. I ship agentic AI gated by evaluation suites, with a person in the loop wherever a wrong answer carries a cost. That is why I'm applying for the Lead Product Manager role.

At AppFolio I build agentic features for property managers and own the trust layer. I set what an agent is allowed to do, gate every release behind an evaluation suite, and keep a human in the loop on the calls that carry risk. I came to product from data science, so model choice, grounding, and prompt-response design are things I reason about directly, not hand off. I also rebuilt our core product from the ground up, and it now fills vacancies three to five days faster with submissions nearly doubled.

I raise the bar by example: clean specs, sharp decisions, and a quality line engineers and designers can build against. I have real 0-to-1 range. I founded a company and built a startup's first data function from nothing, and I ship in close partnership with engineering and design. Ambiguous, accuracy-critical problems are where I do my best work, which is the whole game in legal AI.

Eve is AI-native and works with the same labs I learn from, which is exactly where I want to build. I'm in San Mateo and glad to be on-site. Hand me a case-critical surface and you can stop worrying about whether the AI holds up.

Thank you for your time,
