Tarro · San Mateo, CA

Dear Tarro team,

I spent nine months as a small-business owner: making my own product, running my own numbers, and chasing my own customers. I never forgot how hard it is, or how much a good tool would have helped. Tarro builds those tools for mom and pop restaurants, and that's the work I want to do. I'm applying for the Product Manager role.

Today I build vertical software for small property managers at AppFolio. I rebuilt our core product, the rental application, from a dead-end form into a modern one, and it now fills vacancies three to five days faster with submissions nearly doubled. I own the work end to end: I read the data and I sit in 50 to 100 customer conversations a year, then ship fast against the metrics that move the business. Weighing the numbers against what an owner actually tells you is how I find the real problem.

I also build from zero. I founded an apparel company on my own and set up the boring parts too, the P&L model and the launch process, not just the product. At Lively, an early startup, I stood up the first data function when there was almost no data to work with, and built the APIs that moved $50M+ between financial institutions. Ambiguous, low-data, high-ownership is where I do my best work.

The restaurant problem fits where product is going: AI that makes order taking faster and more accurate without losing the human touch, which is the kind of well-tested, agentic AI I ship now. I'm in the Bay Area and happy to be in San Mateo three days a week. I'd love to help small restaurants thrive.

Thank you for your time,

Ben Siverly
